BEES ON BEAVER?!

For the past week, there has been an extreme increase in the number of bees on Beaver Beach. Having taken advantage of the COVID-19 regulations within the dining halls, my compatriots and I have gotten To-Go food and brought it out to the beach area.

On the beach, "Watermelon Man" by Herbie Hancock is often played in a cannon. Could this musical anomaly stir up the inner anger of an invertebrate? The frequency of the notes triggered a decible-level sound wave into the bees antennae, causing a distastrous bee-action. Word on the street is, Christmas music will be playing next week. Hope these bees like Bing Crobsey! The bottles used as intstruments to create the unique sounds in Herbie's "Watermelon Man" are beer bottles. Something that bees are known to enjoy? The taste of beer.

Perhaps the bees, reminded of the sweet taste of beer, were moved by Herbie's funk and groove. The buzzing of the bees, created by the motors in their robot bodies, harmoniously sync up with the sounds of Hancock. Just like the birds, the bees are not real, but rather machines created by computer science majors at Kenyon College.

As the bees buzz around Beaver busily, bringing bits of bananas and burgers back to their abode, boys bounce buoyantly behind Beaver.

In spite of these things, there are rumours of ghosts in Silverstein? More on that to come.

Back to the bees. A Bostonian Norwegian man killed one today with a cleverly constructed yogurt trap from Huffman. Around its thorax was a tiny tracking tag, like the ones you see on wild animals in the woods. This peculiarity got us talking. Was it Denison, the administration, a third party? Someone deliberately put this tag on the insect as a means of tracking its location, indubitably.

Due to the recent gathering prohibitions on Beaver Beach, the bees are here to enforce. It's not out of the realm of possibility that the bees were placed there with the intention of breaking up romantic relationships. Thanks a lot, bees.
